

Build Canada Constitution

These are the principles that guide Build Canada. We apply these to our work and decision making.

Adopted March 2026

Preamble

Build Canada exists because we believe this country's greatest days are ahead of it — built by the hands, ideas, and ambition of people who refuse to accept decline. We are builders: founders, tradespeople, engineers, creators, investors, and citizens who believe that a nation grows when its people are free to strive, compete, and succeed on their own terms.

This document sets out our foundational beliefs. Every memo we write, every position we take, and every initiative we champion must be consistent with these principles. If it isn't, we change the memo — not the principles.

Article I — Merit Is the Standard

We believe that talent, effort, competence, and results are the only legitimate basis for advancement in any domain — hiring, promotion, contracting, funding, and recognition.

No person should be advantaged or disadvantaged on the basis of identity. The question is always the same: Can you do the work?

We reject systems that substitute demographic profiles for demonstrated ability. We reject the soft bigotry of lowered expectations. We hold every person to the same high standard because that is what respect actually looks like.

Article II — Equality of Opportunity, Not Equality of Outcomes

Every Canadian deserves a fair starting line. We champion the removal of genuine barriers — poverty, lack of access to education, geographic isolation, bureaucratic gatekeeping — that prevent capable people from entering the arena.

But we draw a hard line at engineering equal results. Outcomes vary because people vary — in interests, priorities, effort, and aptitude. That variation is not a flaw in the system. It is the system working as it should.

A just society neutralizes the circumstances a person is born into while preserving the rewards that flow from choice and effort. Treating unequal outcomes as automatic proof of injustice collapses that distinction — and can only end by abandoning merit to manufacture equality that doesn't exist.

Economists across the political spectrum have converged on this point: the goal is mobility, not compression of results. These are different targets, and the policies that follow are very different too. We oppose outcome mandates not because we are indifferent to fairness, but because we take it seriously.

Article III — Pro-Building, Pro-Prosperity

A country that makes it hard to build things will eventually run out of things worth having. We believe in an economy where starting a business is simple, growing one is possible, and succeeding at one is celebrated rather than punished.

We stand for lower regulatory burden, competitive taxation, faster permitting, and a government that sees enterprise as the engine of national prosperity — not a resource to be extracted from.

Prosperity is not a zero-sum game. When a business creates value, the country gets wealthier. When an entrepreneur succeeds, she has not taken something from someone else — she has made something that did not exist before.

Article IV — Against Discrimination and Labelling

We oppose discrimination in all its forms — including the forms that dress themselves up as progress.

Sorting people into identity categories and assigning them collective guilt or collective victimhood is not justice. It is the same tribalism that has caused immeasurable harm throughout human history, wearing new language.

We evaluate people as individuals. We do not ask what group someone belongs to in order to determine what they are owed or what they owe.

We reject the practice of labelling those who disagree with prevailing orthodoxy as morally deficient. Good-faith disagreement is not hatred. Open debate is not harm. A free society requires both.

Article V — Freedom of Expression and Open Inquiry

Building requires thinking, and thinking requires the freedom to be wrong. We defend the right of every Canadian to speak, question, and dissent without fear of professional destruction or social coercion.

We are deeply skeptical of any institution — public or private — that appoints itself as the arbiter of acceptable thought. The best ideas survive scrutiny. The worst ideas are defeated by better ones, not by silence.

Article VI — Responsibility and Agency

We believe that individuals are the primary authors of their own lives. While circumstances vary and genuine hardship exists, the default posture of a builder is agency: What can I do about this?

We do not cultivate dependence. We do not teach people that forces beyond their control have predetermined their fate. We believe that the most empowering thing you can tell another human being is: You are capable, and what you do matters.

Article VII — Canada Builds for Canadians

We believe in a patriotism rooted not in exclusion but in ambition — the conviction that this country can and should be among the most prosperous, innovative, and free nations on earth.

That means building housing, infrastructure, energy, and industry at the pace and scale the country demands. It means removing the obstacles — regulatory, ideological, and bureaucratic — that have turned Canada into a country where it takes years to approve what should take months.

We are impatient with decline. We are impatient with managed expectations. We believe Canadians deserve better, and we intend to build it.

Article VIII — How We Apply These Beliefs

These principles are not decorative or performative. They function as a test:

Before we publish a position, endorse a policy, or issue a statement, we ask:

1. Does this uphold merit as the standard?
2. Does this expand opportunity without mandating outcomes?
3. Does this make it easier or harder to build?
4. Does this treat people as individuals?
5. Does this respect free expression and open debate?
6. Does this encourage agency and responsibility?

If the answer to any of these is no, we go back to the drawing board.

Closing

Build Canada is not a movement against anyone. It is a movement for something: a country where what you build matters more than what box you check, where prosperity is the goal and merit is the path, and where every citizen is free to rise as far as their talent and determination will carry them.

We build. That is who we are.

This document represents the foundational beliefs of Build Canada. All organizational communications, policy positions, and public statements should be evaluated against these principles.
